The original church at Barry has long been demolished, down to a few feet above the ground.

The ruin is completely surrounded by lairs.

The lairs are in lines on a north / south axis as is the norm for a Scottish Kirkyard, making the stones face east / west.

The stones are identified by one or two letters followed by a 2 digit number.

The letter(s) identify the row, while the numbers identify the stones counting southwards from the north end of the row.

The single letter is used in the south west section, while the two letters beginning E are for the south east section.

The two letters the same are for the extension at the northern half of the churchyard.

This method of identification is for this publication only.

All dates used in this text are written in day number, then months written in full, followed by the years in four digits. eg 27 January 1944.
